SUNDAY RECAP

Three trust signals I look for on a supplement product page.

All three come from one store I reviewed this month.

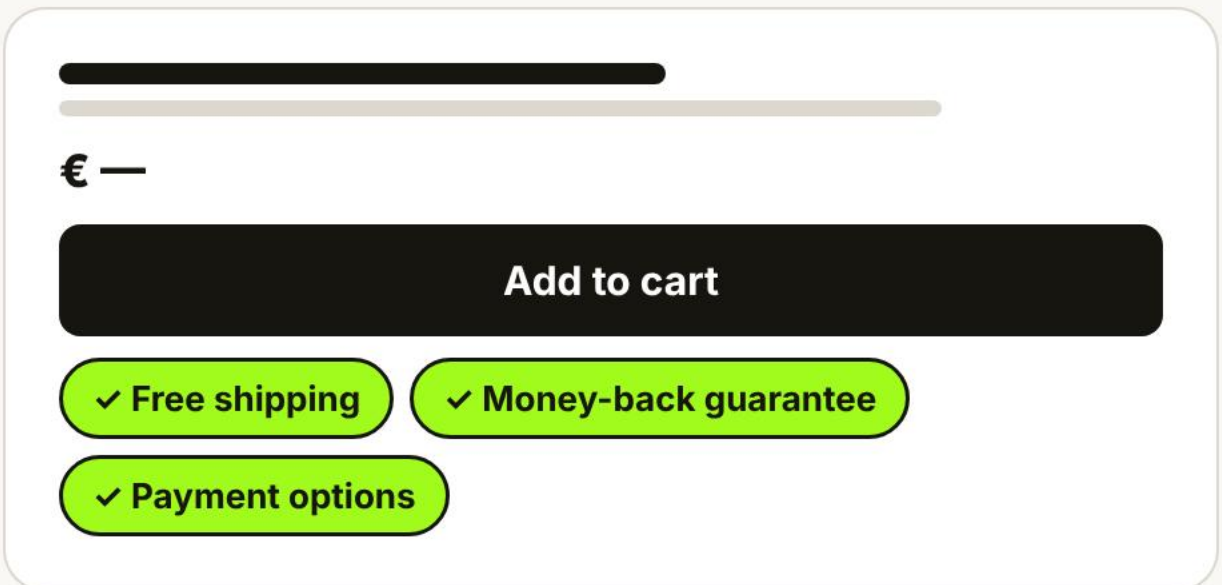

1 2 3

Swipe →

1

Risk handled next to the button

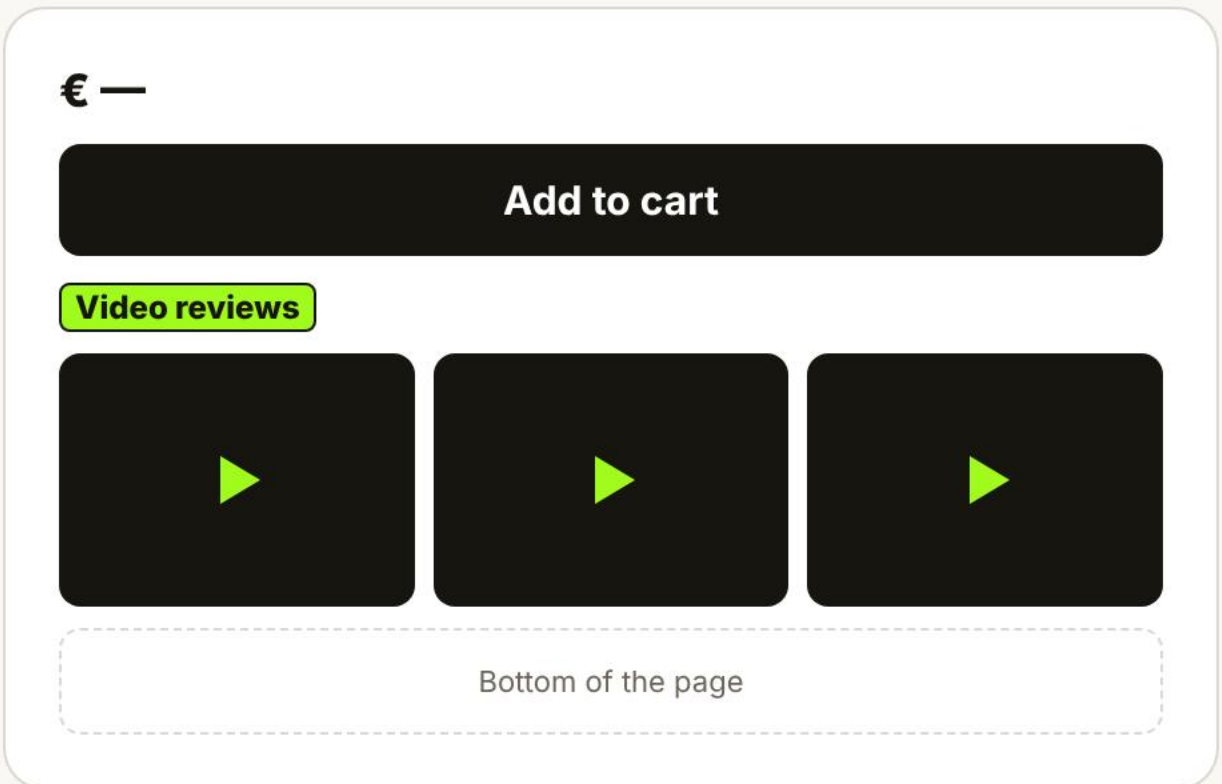

Shipping, the money-back guarantee and payment options sat right under add to cart. A new visitor didn't have to go looking.

2

Real people, early

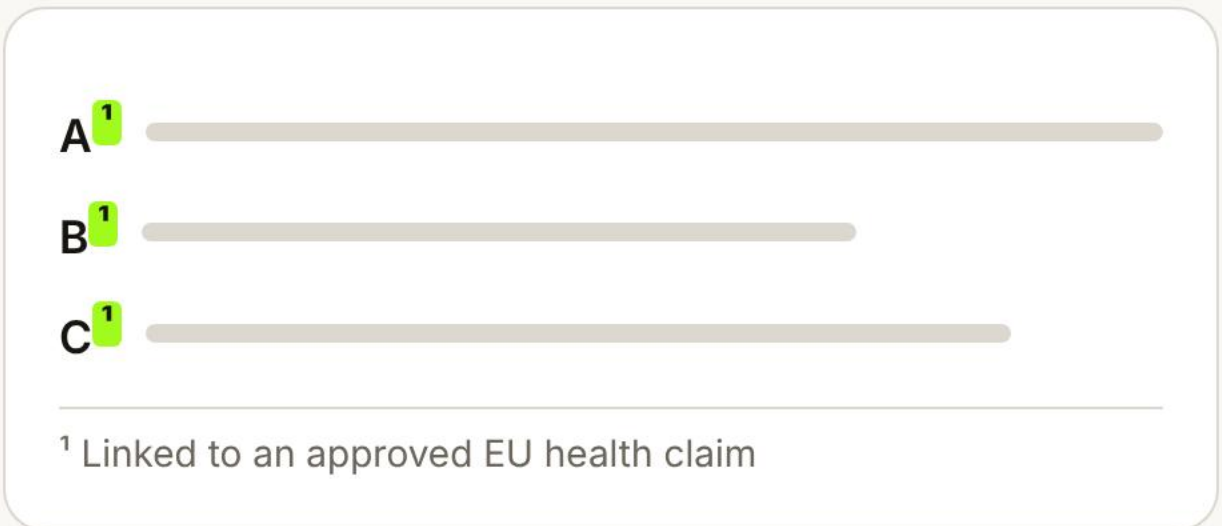

Video reviews came straight after the buy box, not at the bottom of the page. They were there while someone was still deciding.

3

Claims done carefully

Every ingredient benefit was footnoted to the approved EU health claims. It shows the brand isn't making things up, without having to say so.

AT PAYMENT, TOO

of US online shoppers who abandoned an order during checkout said they didn't trust the site with their credit card information.

Source: Baymard Institute, cart abandonment survey (US online shoppers). baymard.com/lists/cart-abandonment-rate

QUICK CHECK

Look at your own product page.

- [ ] Shipping, guarantee and payment visible next to the button?
- [ ] Real reviews before the bottom of the page?
- [ ] Ingredient claims you can back up?

This is a surface-level first look from the outside. A full audit goes much deeper.

Send me a message