THE SITUATION

EVERYTHING looked fine?

I took over a Shopify theme for a US supplement brand. Before touching anything, I compared the documentation to the site's real state — I've learned the hard way that handover docs aren't always complete or accurate.

Docs: supposedly fine

THIS IS WHY I ALWAYS CHECK

03

THREE MISTAKES

THE DOCS were wrong.

The documentation had the wrong live theme ID. It said there was no remote Git repo — there was. And it marked a template as dead code, even though the site was using it.

- ✕ Git repo — wrong
- ✕ Template — wrong

ALL THREE WERE WRONG

WHAT WAS AT STAKE

WHAT COULD'VE happened?

If I'd trusted the docs, I could've uploaded to the wrong theme, or deleted a template that was still live. Fixing that in production could've cost half a day — checking first took ten to twenty minutes.

Fix in production: half a day

THE CHECK WAS WORTH IT

WHAT I LEARNED

REALITY, not the docs.

On any project I take over, I check reality first, not the documentation — that's a reflex now. Most of my clients aren't developers, and it's not their job to understand everything behind the scenes — so I have to represent the technical side.

Reflex: reality > docs
